Excerpt: .these letters had given her the only moments of joy she had. All at once she exclaimed, The Cayrols are at Nice, at my daughter s! Píkr. (very attentive) Ah! Mar. After the marriage, there had been a sort of a coolness between the two householdS. They saw very little of each other. Cayrol had been making long business tours in Europe, and his wife hid accompanied him. Now they have just returned from Greece. Pier. And why should their arrival cause Mdme. Desvarennnes to leave? Mar. I do not know. Perhaps when she learnt that all her four children were together she felt her isolation at Paris all the more painful. Perhaps she wished to pass a few hours with her famfly. Pier. (observing Marechal) And perhaps, too, she hus eome expressly to talk with her son-in-law. Mar. Oh, I think that for some time past they have had nothing more to say to each other. Pier. He. it is possible! But she? The fact is that this Prince is getting himself talked about. His name is in everybody s mouth here. Even those who would like to forget him have not the leisure. He is the hero of what is called high life. His brilliant style dazzles the idlers. People vie with each other in describing his luxury, and the splendour of his fetes, and they reckon up vith astonishment the sums he loses at the Club in a single night wítlout...
