Even if the same length of time produced in chil Practice in the Case of Addition, American Journal of Psychology, Vol. XXI, pp. 483-488. dren a percentile improvement only half as great as here, the gain would still probably be far greater than the gain by any of the customary forms of drill. This is the nearest norm for a comparison known to the author. Dr. Thorndikes students practiced about 53 minutes; the children in the authors experiment practiced 60 minutes or about one and a fifth times as long. His students showed a median gain of 41 per cent; the children in this experiment, 48 per cent. In 50 minutes of practice in division the children in this experiment made a median gain of 75...
