Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Valley of the Rio Grande: Its Soil, Productions, Climate, C., C The time is probably not far distant when the Egyptian cotton will be cultivated in the valley of the Rio Grande to as great an extent as on the banks of the Nile. A few experiments have been made in the culture of the cotton plant in the vicinity of Matamoras, and have proved remarkably successful. It grows in this region with wonderful luxuriance, and yields abundantly, almost without labor or care. The sugar cane also here grows to an enormous size, and far exceeds in its products the cane of Louisiana or of any portion of Eastern Texas. It has been remarked by naturalists that tropical plants are more productive at or near the Northern limits of their growth, than near the equator. If this doctrine is correct, the culture of sugar cane will be found more profitable in the lower portion of the Valley of the Rio Grande than it is even in Cuba. Many valuable tropical fruits may also be grown in this section with great advantage. The orange, fig and pomegranate flourish with great luxuriance in the neighborhood of Matamoras and Camargo. Such advantages of soil and climate cannot be overlooked, and it may be taken for granted that at no distant day, large portions of the country between Point Isabel and Laredo, and even above the Presidio del Rio Grande, will be covered with plantations of sugar cane and Egyptian cotton, interspersed with groves of oranges, figs, olives, and other fruits of the tropics, surpassing in luxuriance of growth and beauty of appearance the same productions in any other...
