Hog-sties are usually built in a very plain and simple method, the chief objects being considered those of warm dry situations for the animals to He in, with small areas or yards before them, and proper troughs fitted up for holding their food. They are most commonly constructed with lean-to or shed roofs, and have but seldom more than six or seven feet width, with height in the same proportion. In order to have them as convenient as possible, they should be at no very great distance from the house and offices, being well placed for the kitchen and dairy, but as little connected with the other outbuildings as may be. Some have suggested the great propriety and advantage, in particular cases, of having them connected in such a manner with the scullery, as that the whole of the refuse articles from it may be readily conveyed to them by means of pipes or other similar contrivances. Where they are at a distance they should constantly be so situated as that the servants need not have occasion to enter the farm yards in the business of feeding them. Although it be the common notion that hogs are naturally filthy in their habits, there are probably very few domestic animals that are more pleased when they have clean comfortable beds, and certainly not any on which cleanliness has a more evident effect, so far as thriving, feeding, and fattening are concerned. With the view...
